

I write to object to alterations currently being undertaken at the above address.

Firstly I was under the impression that near neighbours had the right to be notified of any type of development which might affect their day to day existence.

I have never had any notification from the Council regarding this development.

Secondly I was horrified to learn that the works which are going on at the Brookfield Hotel - and have been going on for some six months have not yet received planning permission. How can that be in this age of correctness?

What happens if you do not grant permission? Do they have to reinstate the premises as it was?

More importantly, this week I notice that an external decking has suddenly been erected in front of the building taking up valuable car parking land and opening up the road to the possibility of entertainment excess noise! I am situated about (Redacted) from this decking area, and already am not able to sit outside because of increased traffic noise because of recent developments.

|If they want an area for external sitting and dining, there is a delightful area that the Brookfield Hotel used to the rear. It is both private and secluded. Then important car parking space would not be used up.

I wholeheartedly object to this external feature. Has the council sent any officers to warn the developers who are abusing these planning issues. If I wished to alter my house, I understand that I need Planning permission FIRST!

Recently I read of the Crooked Pub in the Midlands being bulldozed to the ground without planning permission. (following a fire).

I was overjoyed to hear that their local authority have served notice on the cowboy developers. The notice demands that the building is put back together, to reinstate it exactly as it was. If more authorities did this, you would soon arrive at a situation in which the law is not treated as an ASS
