Hi David

I was still going to have a chat with you on this one. My initial concern would be that at some future point, somebody may want to convert these offices into a dwelling; I imagine this would require consent for change of usage. However in terms of office use, I think using the same informative again is fine. The info on the passive vent systems available is just that – info. No comment on what system is to be employed, yet more importantly what acoustic glazing is proposed for use, what anti-vibration construction methods are to be incorporated. For office use its probably OK but I doubt we would ever consider it suitable for habitable purposes, with the type of info given up front. I haven't had a chance to read thro' all documentation as yet, but did not come across info relating to what I have mentioned above.

I'm in Winchester all day today, but will be back in the office on Monday.

Kind regards

Mark Moss
